Consignment Agreement Review List

This review list is provided to inform you about the document in question and assist you in its preparation. Consignment agreements rarely work very well and the Consignor should work diligently to move the Consignee to being a paying customer. Deep discounts are much to be preferred to the consignment, "Try it, you'll like it," approach.

As a practical matter for the Consignor should review the relationship monthly to be sure the terms and conditions are being lived up to and see if a possibility to converting the Consignee to a customer. Remember, a consignment is not a sale and should not be accounted for in that manner according to GAP (Generally Accepted Accounting Principles). If you attempt to pledge a consignment sale to almost any financial institution as a Sale or Accounts Receivable, you will be in violation of the agreement and usually chargeable with fraud for that action. So be very careful how you account for any consignment transaction.

1. Print multiple copies with each party having one. Be sure to provide a copy to your outside financial institutions, if required by agreement with them. Keep a copy with the Consignee's file as well as in your minute book.
